When I first started learning how to fly a model plane I was around 6 years old. But one thing that i really had to do! I had to start somewhere.. So I started out with a basic simulator on a crappy computer. But for me, this was the best game I had at the time and it couldn't get any better!

In the start I got really frustrated every time I crashed and I really wanted to improve. So instantaneous i asked for my dad's help. When I then finally understood how everything worked and how it all made sense.. I could fly for some seconds before I crashed again... I remember this very well, that I gave up for a long while and tried out some other simulators. Until the day I got my own little electric plane! I remember that I had a lot of fun with it, but eventually.. I crashed... I cried and cried like if the world had ended.. But when my dad told me it was okay it got a little better..

some years later I got a little better in holding the plane still and maneuvering high up in the sky with my dads sailplane, I got better and better and then finally I could fly in a competition! This was and still is just fun for me..

Having aeromoddeling as my first sport makes it my favorite sport and I will continue doing it.

My aspirations for the future with aeromoddeling must be to beat my dad in a competition and have as much fun with it as I can! I also love traveling to other country's to then compete in bigger competitions and meet both new and old friends.

When I first started learning how to fly a model plane I was around 6 years old.

But one thing that I really had to do!

I had to start somewhere.. So I started out with a basic simulator on a crappy computer.

But for me, this was the 'best' game I had at the time and it couldn't get any better! In the start I got really frustrated every time I crashed and I really wanted to improve.

So instantaneous I asked for my dad's help.

When I then finally understood how everything worked and how it all made sense.. I could fly for some seconds before I crashed again..
